PAY WITH YOUR CELL PHONE

You might be aware of the option to pay via your cell phone but have been a little nervous to try it yourself.

More and more people are leaving their wallet behind and embracing their cell phone to check out-as long as the place they're shopping has the correct equipment.

If you're new to the world of app-based payments, but want to upgrade from the old cash and cards approach, it's easier than you might think to get set up. In fact, you have most of what you'll need already installed on your phone.

Android Pay launched in September 2015, and its primary purpose is to let you quickly pay at the checkout in a retail store. The technology has also found its way to apps and online shopping.

Android Pay works on phones and tablets using Android 4.4 or higher, as well as Android Wear watches.

You can manage all of your cards and other payment information through the Android Pay app on your phone. If you have already registered certain cards with Google (for in-app payments), then you can quickly add these to Android Pay with just a few taps. You do need to have some sort of lock on your phone (like a fingerprint or passcode) to use Android Pay, as this can verify your identity.

In the store, make sure your phone is unlocked, tap it against the terminal for a few seconds, and wait for the green light. The system will send an authorized token rather than your actual card details.

Samsung Pay, despite the name, works on any modern Android phone, not just Samsung devices. You can also install it on the Gear S2 and Gear S3 smartwatches. Once you've added the Samsung Pay app to your device, add your cards within the app. When it comes time to pay, simply unlock your phone and then hold your phone against the terminal to use your card.

Samsung Pay does have the advantage over Apple Pay and Android Pay in that it works with both contactless terminals and those terminals that use the old magnetic stripe technology. You do need a recent Samsung device for the contactless terminals to work.

Paypal, Square Cash and Venmo are a few other payment options. These apps need to link to a real bank account or card also.

No matter which app you try, we do recommend you have a lock on your phone whether the app requires it or not.
