MAKE THE MOST OF YOUR CAMERA

If you're like most people these days, you don't carry a camera with you. Why would you when you have a cell phone that possibly has a better camera than the last one you bought.

But are you getting the most of our camera? Kim Komando, a digital lifestyle expert, recently wrote an article about this topic with a list of apps to optimize your cell phone camera in some interesting ways.

CamFind uses images instead of words to conduct a search. It generates a list of similar images and related search results to choose from including price comparisons and local shopping results.

According to komando.com, the Amazon mobile shopping app takes being a visual person to another level. You can search for products by snapping a photo, scanning a barcode, or to redeem a gift card. You can also place digital objects into your surroundings to see if you like them.

The eBay app can help you put a name to an item you're unsure of. In other words, if you know you want something but cannot for the life of you remember what it's called, you can take a picture of the item. The app will search for auctions that match that image.

With the Photomath app you no longer have to reach for a calculator every time you need some number help. You point your camera at an equation that's typed or hand written and get an answer. It can even show you the steps used to find the answer! Now helping your kids with homework is a little easier.

The next time you need help translating another language use the Google Translate app. Take a picture of whatever you don't understand, and it will change the text on the screen. It works in 38 different languages and can make you a more confident traveler.

There are plenty of apps to help you improve your pictures too. Camera MX has editing tools, special effects and other extra features to improve your photography skills.

Retrica is an app that applies live filters to photos as you take them. There are over 100 filters to choose from.
